

We almost didn't know.

For 57 years, Alfred Endres told his family he had been a barber, chauffeur, and translator in World War II. But following the death of his wife, Alfred quietly started sharing a glimpse into his actual wartime experiences. His daughter first began capturing those fractions of stories on napkins during her weekly nursing home visits, which grew into a nearly two-decade deep dive into his true role in the war—a reluctant front-line machine gunner in Europe from 1944 to 1945.

Intensely researched and thoroughly human, Alfred compiles a lifetime panorama of one infantryman who never wanted a part in the war but accepted it. He returned home, discernably the gentle Wisconsin farmer he was when he left, to a family unknowing what he had done and what he had survived.

Author Louise Endres Moore is Alfred's daughter, raised one of eight siblings on a farm in Lodi, Wisconsin. A mathematics instructor, it was her initial major in psychology that sustained her through years of researching her father's path in World War II and his reluctance to speak of it. Listen carefully. War does not feel good to those who have given the most.
